Westminster Abbey.
Explorations in the Royal Vault—The Coffins of Elizabeth and Mary Stuart.

[Correspondence of the N. Y. Evening Post.]

LONDON, June 23, 1871.—Among the most interesting of recent events in Westminster Abbey has been the singular series of explorations made by Dean Stanley during the last year or two among the royal tombs. These explorations have resulted in the disclosure of many singular facts which throw doubt on the authenticity of the printed histories of the Abbey. Since the accession of the first of the four Georges no monarchs have been interred in Westminster; and since Elizabeth no monarchs have been erected to those sovereigns who have joined their predecessors in the gloomy vaults. The two Charleses, the two Jameses, Queen Anne and William and Mary all lie under the chance of the Abbey, with out any raised stone to mark their burial places, and until 1866 there was no inscription to guide the curious visitor to the spot. In that year the Dean caused the names of the dead sovereigns to be cut into the stone floor.

Dean Stanley's explorations were made while endeavoring to find out the precise spot where James I. was buried. The facts of James' funeral were only imperfectly recorded in the Abbey register, and no intimation as to the exact place of sepulture could be discovered. To settle the question the tombs of the kings were opened, and for a long time in vain. At last a vault was disclosed, which, from its locality, was known to be that of Henry VII., and in it were found three leaden coffins, sunk and decayed. Two of them were those of Henry and his queen, and the other proved to be the missing coffin of James I. Here he lay, apart from all his kindred, who were interred in tombs underlying other parts of the chapel; and it is surmised that he was laid here at his own request, and probably from a superstitious idea that his dynasty would be strengthened if he slept his last sleep beside such an unquestioned representative of English monarchy as Henry VII.

James built the monuments to his predecessors Elizabeth and Bloody Mary, and to his mother, the unhappy Queen of Scots. Dean Stanley had the tomb of the Virgin Queen—the most unsuspicious of the Shakespearian lines—opened and the coffins were found lying one on the other, that of Elizabeth being uppermost. The wooden case enclosing the coffin had partially decayed, but there yet was to be seen upon it the date 1603, as the carved Tudor badge—a full double rose—besides the letters E. R., for Elizabeth Regina. There were on the cases traces of red velvet trappings. "The sight of this secluded and narrow tomb," writes Dean Stanley, "thus compressing in the closet grasp the two Tudor sisters, partners of the same throne and grave, sleeping in the hope of the same resurrection—the solemn majesty of the great Queen thus reposing, as can hardly be doubted, by her own desire, on her sister's coffin—was more impressive from the contrast of its quiet calm with the confused and multitudinous decay of the Stuart vault, and the fulness of its tragic interest with the vacancy of the deserted spaces which had hitherto been explored in other parts of the chapel. The vault was immediately closed again.

THE TOMB OF THE STUARTS.
The allusion to "the multitudinous decay of the Stuart vault" will be understood by a brief explanation of the dreadful condition in which Dean Stanley found that receptacle of royal mortality. Few people care to consider curious as these matters. Most tourists probably think that the bodies of the kings and queens in Westminster actually lie in the splendid sarcophagi erected to their honor. In ancient times this was the case, but it has not been so for several centuries. The tombs in Westminster Abbey are merely cenotaphs; and the dead in whose honor they are built lie in the immediate vicinity—but not always directly underneath.

The monuments in the Abbey and in the chapel of Henry VII. are all very fine to the eye; but under the floor on which they stand are caverns literally "full of dead men's bones and all uncleanliness." The Stuart vault is a notable example of this. It was opened in the course of the recent efforts to settle the questions as to where Mary Queen of Scots lay buried, and as to who was buried in the vault with her. Taking up some of the slabs of the pavement, stone steps were disclosed leading downward; at the foot was found a vault about thirteen feet long by seven wide and six high. "A startling, it may almost be said an awful scene presented itself. A vast pile of leaden coffins rose from the floor, some of full stature, the larger number varying in form from that of the full-grown child to the merest infant, coarsely heaped upon the others, while several urns of various shapes were tossed about in irregular positions throughout the vault."

Dean Stanley in this frightful place found the tomb of the heroine of so much poetry and romance, Mary Queen of Scots, lying next to the wall of the vault. It supported the coffin of Arabella Stuart, and was much compressed and distorted by it and by the superincumbent weight of four or five lesser coffins lying piled on the top. Near by was the coffin of Henry Frederick, Prince of Wales, who died in 1612. The other large coffins in this vault were those of Mary, Princess of Orange, Prince Rupert, Anne Hyde, James II.'s first wife, and Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia.

One would think that after receiving all these distinguished inmates, the vault would have been closed. But on the tops of these coffins were spread an immense family of little children, including the children of James II., and several children died when but a few months old. Among them was James Darnley, a natural son of James II., whose existence was hitherto unknown.

Dean Stanley attributes this lack of anything like order and decency in this wreck and ruin of the Stuart dynasty to the pressure of superincumbent weight rather than to any wanton havoc or neglect; and he caused the smaller coffins to be arranged in some order, leaving the larger ones untouched.

During these excavations the body of Charles Worsley, one of Cromwell's generals, was discovered. It had been overlooked when, at the Restoration, the remains of Cromwell, and those of his supporters who had been buried in the Abbey, were ignominiously disinterred. These researches have been of great service in settling several disputed historical points.

DRUGS AND CHEMICALS.

SIMMONS' LIVER REGULATOR.
The symptoms of Liver Complaint are uneasiness and pain in the side. Sometimes the pain is in the shoulder, and is mistaken for rheumatism. The stomach is affected with loss of appetite and sickness, bowels in general costive, sometimes alternating with laxity. The head is troubled with pain; and dull, heavy sensation, considerable loss of memory, accompanied with painful sensation of having left undone something which ought to have been done. Often complaining of weakness, debility and low spirits. Sometimes many of the above symptoms attend the disease, and at other times very few of them; but the liver is generally the organ most involved. Cure the liver with
